All the world knows what Callimachus has said about a book, when it arrives at a fourth volume. The minutest Grecian has those four Greek words, at least, by heart; and the most slender wit can quote what is omnibus lippis notum et tonsoribus. What could Callimachus have known about big books. Did he ever read the Statutes at large, or eight volumes of the Life of Antar, or the lucubrations of Duns Scotus, or the Works of Pere Macedo, or the seven folios of Count Marsigly on the Danube, or Van Swietens Commentaries on Boerhaaves Aphorisms, or Sir Charles Grandison, or the 36525 volumes of Trismegistus. Four octavoës! Have I not described two hundred islands, and a thousand mountains and lakes, and heaven knows how many miles of heath, and bog, and salt sea brine, besides forests, and cascades, and rivers innumerable. On Count Marsiglys plan, the very rivers alone are entitled to four hundred folios. Pliny understood those things better. Bonus liber, says Pliny, melior est quisque, quo major. Such is the consequence of travelling. Yet does not a man travel to enquire de omni scibili, and must be not fill up bis pages with all the quibus dams which belong to such matters. Cardan was accused of making digressions that he might eke out his sheet, because be was paid by the foot. It is probable that he was a writer of reviews.
