O Ill neer wed the green-wood queen, Wha rides with jack and brand; Nor ever grasp, in amorous clasp, A maidens iron hand. Young Maxweix, An Old GaUovidian Ballad. That the beauty, and we may add, heroism of Allan had made a deep impression on her heart, has just been shown. She felt as if the dawn of an intellectual morning had arisen on her soul, and was hurrying before it those fierce and vindictive passions, which had hitherto shed only a lurid radiance over the brightest features of her by-past life. She felt that something else was necessary to her happiness than feats of arms, victory and plunder,--and she was resolved on its attainment, no matter by what means. And yet on turning the subject in her mind, she could discover nothing but difficulties of the most formidable character, which, like the ceutinels round an enemys camp, stood in grizzly armour to bar the path which led to the consummation of her wishes. On a first view, however, one would be naturally led to conclude, that the difficulties so much dwelt on, were rather the spectres of her own fancy, than the sober realitiesof active life. Allan was her prisoner, and consequently in her power; and she fondly clung to the hope, that no alternative would be so dreadful to him as being delivered up to her father. She was besides but a very few years his senior; of a tall majestic stature; with features, (which, according to her own ideas of female; beauty), were not inelegant; a clear brown complexion, heightened by her constant exposure to the elements; of an athletic make; with an eye brilliant as a sunbeam, and piercing as that
